Foreword

It has now been nine years since the 1st edition of this policy scan was completed by Rachel Stevenson and myself in 2008. That report was one of the first research activities of the Canadian Disability Policy Alliance (CDPA), and has served as the basis for much of our subsequent research and policy analysis. The 2nd edition by Rebecca Bond and myself (2013) broadened the focus from policy affecting people with mobility impairments to include policy affecting people with physical, cognitive and sensory disabilities. I was very fortunate to work with these two law students, both of whom taught me a great deal about searching out legislation and legal databases.

The 3rd edition further refines the methodology and includes live links to sections of the statutes that are most pertinent to disability policy analysis. The 3rd edition also includes disability policy from the three territories (Yukon, Nunavut and North West Territories). I have been privileged to work with CDPA's current and previous Project Managers, Shannon Jones and Lynn Roberts, doctoral candidate in Rehabilitation Science, Atul Jaiswal, and MPH graduate, Caitlyn Murphy. We also acknowledge the contributions of Mike Schaub, CDPA's first Project Manager, particularly his chronology of disability policy in Canada.

We acknowledge financial support to the CDPA of the Canadian Disability Participation Project (CDPP; led by Kathleen Martin-Ginis from UBC, funded by Social Sciences & Humanities Research Council) and the Canadian Access and Inclusion Project (CAIP; led by Bill Adair of Spinal Cord Injury Canada, funded by Human Resources & Skills Development Canada).

In conclusion, we offer a word about language concerning disability. We are acutely aware that there is considerable sensitivity, and no consensus around "correct" language referring to disability. There are clear preferences expressed in the literature for both the terms "people with disabilities" and "disabled people". In the Alliance, our guiding principle is inclusivity and respect. We seek to use language that invites others into dialogue, and that welcomes a variety of perspectives. We refer to federal guidelines for non-discriminatory language. We seek neutrality and clarity of communication in language.

We invite you to download it, copy it, distribute it, use and share it as you wish. It is offered as a resource to disability scholars and spokespersons, with our compliments and our best wishes.

Respectfully,
Mary Ann McColl, PhD, MTS

About the Canadian Disability Policy Alliance

The Canadian Disability Policy Alliance (CDPA) is a national collaboration of disability researchers, community disability organizations, and federal and provincial policy-makers, aimed at creating and mobilizing knowledge to enhance disability policy in Canada, and to promote equity and opportunity for disabled Canadians. The Alliance was funded by the Social Sciences & Humanities Research Council's Community University Research Alliance (CURA) Program for five years (2009-14) and the Partnership Program for seven years (2014-21).

“Our vision for Canada is a place where people with disabilities enjoy full participation and citizenship, supported by a coherent framework of legislation, regulation and programs.”

Mission

- United Voices: Researchers, consumers, policy makers, providers, educators, and employers working together, across jurisdictions, across boundaries, across barriers.
- Learning Collaboratively: Using collaborative, emancipatory research processes to produce context-relevant evidence through focused, interactive research cycles.
- Creating Tools for Change: Knowledge translation used effectively to promote evidence-based policy.

Goals

1. Knowledge Creation: To synthesize evidence and, where necessary, generate new knowledge regarding disability policy in Canada and its impact on the lives of people with disabilities.
2. Knowledge Dissemination: To share knowledge with policy makers and other stakeholders to enhance accessibility and inclusion for people with disabilities.
3. Training and Development: To develop capacity in the areas of policy analysis, disability studies and collaborative research among students, staff, and partners associated with the CDPA.

Core Assumptions

At the heart of all the research and knowledge mobilization activities of the Alliance are three core assumptions that frame our approach to seeking enhanced disability policy in Canada:

1. Many of the problems experienced by people with disabilities can be tracked directly back to the policy environment.
2. We already know most of what is needed to support effective disability policy in Canada – in most instances, the research is available to provide evidence for good, sound disability policy. What is needed is context-specific, policy-relevant synthesis of the research.
3. People with a variety of expertise and skills are needed to translate knowledge about disability issues into effective disability policy – disabled consumers, their advocates and support systems; disability researchers and trainees; policy experts and public servants.

Introduction

It is an exciting time to be involved with disability policy in Canada. After a decade of unfulfilled promises, the current federal government is taking aggressive steps toward proposing federal disability legislation (<http://news.gc.ca/web/article-en.do?nid=1089179>). Prime Minister Trudeau has directed the Minister of Sport and Persons with Disabilities – initially the Hon. Carla Qualtrough, now the Hon. Martin Hehr -- to introduce legislation to ensure access and inclusion for all. The Minister has asked for input from Canadians living with disabilities on how to achieve equality of opportunity and remove barriers to inclusion and participation.

According to the most recent data available, disability affects 4.3 million, or 14.3% of Canadians (CSD, 2012). Given that many people with disabilities are embedded in families, one might reasonably estimate that disability affects approximately 35% of the population.

What is disability policy?

Disability policy in Canada is a complex web of legislation, regulations and programs, crossing many departments within government and multiple layers of jurisdiction. There are 38 federal statutes explicitly pertaining to disability, as well as many more that have implications for people with disabilities even though they are not specifically stated. Legislation also exists in each of the 13 provincial and territorial jurisdictions, and municipalities also play a role in administering disability programs and standards, such as the Building Code and welfare services.

Disability policy is perceived by many people with disabilities as impenetrable and complex. It is a patchwork of legislation, regulations, programs, providers and entitlements that requires considerable probing to reveal, and considerable patience to understand. Disability policy in Canada has been described as conflicting, fragmented, incoherent, not user-friendly, a “hit-or-miss” affair (Boyce et al., 2001; Prince, 2004; Cameron & Valentine, 2001).

Disability policy exists to fulfil the role of government toward people with disabilities. We elect governments to enact collective solutions to shared problems in society (Department of Finance Canada, 2006). Governments create disability policy specifically in order to achieve 3 aims (Bickenbach, 2006):

1. Equity – to ensure that disabled citizens are not discriminated against, either willfully or inadvertently;

2. Access – to ensure that disabled citizens are able to participate in all aspects of society.
3. Support – to ensure that disabled citizens are able to acquire the goods and services necessary to meet their needs.

In developed societies, one of the key roles of government is to promote equity among citizens in terms of access to goods, services and opportunities.

- Horizontal equity is achieved when individuals in like circumstances are treated alike. Horizontal equity is easy – it is typically achieved by having rules and applying them uniformly.
- Vertical equity is achieved when individuals in different circumstances are treated differently, commensurate with those circumstances. Vertical equity is a much more challenging ideal to implement, requiring government to acknowledge the life situation of citizens (Technical Advisory Committee on Tax Measures for People with Disabilities, 2004).
- Outcome equity is achieved when individuals reach the same outcome as a result of the policy. Outcome equity is challenged by the need for consensus on outcome measures that effectively and efficiently provide the data necessary to assess outcome equity.

Governments have at their disposal a number of options for achieving their goals.

- Legislation & regulations -- Governments can pass laws that commit both government and citizens to act in certain ways.
- Official statements and publications (eg. throne speech, public reports, web-based resources, media releases) – These documents express the beliefs, culture and goals of government, and contribute to public awareness.
- Programs – by creating funded programs with specific eligibility criteria, governments attempt to meet the needs and desires of particular groups of Canadians, such as people with disabilities.
- Standards development – Governments can require organizations to live up to certain expectations or standards in order to qualify for funding.
- Bilateral agreements – Governments can enter into agreements with the provinces and territories to meet certain requirements on cost-shared programs.
- Procurement and contracting policies -- Finally, government has considerable purchasing power, and it can require private sector companies from which it procures goods or services to operate in ways that are consistent with government's goals and aspirations.

In order to achieve the three goals listed above (equity, access and support), different policy instruments are typically used to meet different aims or objectives (Scanlon, 2013).

1. Equity is typically addressed with human rights and non-discrimination legislation, and with the support of advocacy organizations and citizen groups;
2. Access is typically addressed with specifications and standards, such as building codes, operating / training policies, and funding or incentives to enhance accessibility.
3. Support is usually addressed with programs providing financial resources, goods and services, including:
 - a. pensions, compensation, income replacement;
 - b. taxation measures, credits and relief; and,
 - c. programs providing funding for specific assistance, such as drug benefits, adaptive equipment or attendant care.

The history of disability policy in Canada

The role of the federal government in Canada is spelled out in the British North America Act of 1867 – the act of British parliament that gave Canada its sovereignty. The federal government is responsible to maintain “peace, order and good government”, and to undertake such duties as not explicitly assigned to the provinces. The federal government uses its fiscal power to “bring innovative programs and responses to issues with strong clear national characteristics” (Department of Finance Canada, 2006). The diagram following summarizes the 21 functions that are central to the role of the federal government in Canada.

Unlike other western democracies, such as the US, Britain and Australia, there is no explicit national disability legislation in Canada. Some researchers argue that Canada is no worse off for that (Cameron & Valentine, 2001) -- that the combined effects of our federal and provincial human rights legislation, our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, employment equity legislation, our pension system, welfare system and universal health care provide assurances of equity for people with disabilities. In fact, Canada is the only country that has disability rights enshrined in its constitution (Pooran & Wilke, 2005). Other researchers however disagree -- they identify a pattern of significant erosion of disability programs and supports in recent years (Boyce et al., 2006; Kovacs & Burns, 2010).

The role of the Federal Government is to maintain “peace, order, and good government” (BNA Act, 1867) and to undertake such duties as not explicitly assigned to the provinces or municipalities.

In 1981, the United Nations declared the International Year of Disabled Persons (1981) and the Decade of Disabled Persons (1983-1992). Canada responded with the highly influential Obstacles report (1981), which recommended rights-based omnibus legislation, as well as a full array of enhancements to government programs and services. In 1982, disability policy achieved a major milestone, when disabled people were designated as one of five groups whose rights were specifically guaranteed in Section 15 of Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1982). At the same time, other English-speaking countries passed rights-based disability legislation – the American's with Disabilities Act in 1990, Australia's Disability Discrimination Act in 1992, and the UK's Disability Discrimination Act in 1995. Despite a number of political promises, no similar Canadian legislation was passed to supplement the Charter, the Canadian Human Rights Act (1977) and the Employment Equity Act (1986).

In 1996, the federal government's National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities (1991-96), released its report -- known as the Scott Report. The Scott Report recommended a larger role for the federal government in disability policy, and again recommended a national disability act for Canada. In response, the provinces and territories banded together under the Federal / Provincial / Territorial (FPT) Council on Social Policy Renewal, to advocate for renewal of the Social Union (1996). Disability issues were high on the First Ministers' agenda. The provinces picked up the main recommendations of the Scott Report and pushed to make disability issues a collective priority in the pursuit of social policy renewal in 1996 and again in 1997.

In 1998, the FPT Working Group on Disability Issues was created, and several more landmark reports were produced: In Unison (1998), Future Directions (1999), and In Unison 2000 (2000). These documents outlined the federal government's goals for the policy area, including a number of lasting initiatives, such as the Opportunities Fund and the Social Development Partnerships Program. In 2001, the Office of Disability Issues was created by consolidating a small hub of people in the federal civil service to coordinate disability issues and report annually on their progress.

The federal government also implemented the Multilateral Framework for Labour Market Agreements for Persons with Disabilities, resulting in a series of bilateral agreements with provinces in 2003 aimed at promoting employment for people with disabilities. In December 2004. The Working Group continued to apply pressure by releasing their report entitled, Supports and services for adults and children aged 5 – 14 with disabilities in Canada: An analysis of data on needs and gaps.

The federal government introduced a number of financial measures, such as the Registered Disability Savings Plan (2006) and the Accessibility Fund (2007), the Tax free Disability Savings Account, the Canada Student Grants for students with Permanent Disabilities, and Caregiver grants and expenses. The focus in this period was on economic self-sufficiency, rather than citizenship and inclusion (Torjman, 2014).

In 2010, the federal government contributed to the final stages of development of the UN Convention of the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and signed and ratified the agreement (CCD, 2010; UN, 2010). With the ratification of the Convention and the subsequent development of monitoring instruments, disability was included in government initiatives along with other priority populations.

As of 2014, a new era appears to be dawning in disability policy. The current government has appointed a Minister with the explicit portfolio of disability issues, and she has made clear her intention to hear from Canadians about what type of legislation would ensure their access to opportunities and inclusion. Consultations are currently underway, and draft legislation is expected. Furthermore, discussions are afoot about Canada's signing the Optional Protocol of the UNCRPD in 2017, representing a commitment to accountability for the articles of the Convention.

Purpose of this report

One reason for the lack of progress to date on federal disability legislation may be the paucity of sound evidence upon which to build disability policy. Difficult questions and significant ideological tensions persist about how disability policy should be framed (Prince, 2004). These issues have made it difficult for policy-makers to relate to the disability community and to achieve consensus on the needs of people with disabilities (Joiner, 2006; Prince, 2006b). Furthermore, the debate is typically highly polarized, and inflamed by the rhetoric of rights (Bickenbach, 2006). A number of areas exist where there are strong disagreements about how disabled citizens should be viewed, what they need and how they can be best served by governments in Canada (McColl & Jongbloed, 2006).

A supportive disability policy environment is one of the factors that has been identified as essential to full participation and inclusion for people with disabilities. It is essential to understand the policy context within which people with disabilities operate and attempt to carve out a life for themselves in the community.

The purpose of this report is to provide a comprehensive survey of disability policy in Canada, the provinces and territories.

Methodology

The third edition of this scan contains information up to December 2017 on disability policy at the federal and provincial level in Canada. In addition, the report includes for the first time, sections on the three territories (Yukon, Nunavut and North West Territories).

The methodology for the scan is similar to a scoping review (Arksey & O'Malley, 2005; Levac, Colquhoun, & O'Brien, 2010), which typically unfolds in the following stages:

1. Identify the research question
2. Identify all relevant material
3. Select the documents for detailed analysis
4. Chart the results of that analysis according to key concepts

1. Identify the research question

The research question for this study was:

What legislation exists in federal, provincial and territorial jurisdictions in Canada that explicitly addresses the issues that affect people with disabilities?

2. Identify all relevant data

The purpose of the search was to identify legislation, regulations and program directly related to disability. Relevant data for the review were identified following a five-stage process:

- Initially, government websites were searched using the following terms: disability, disabled, injured, handicap, incapacity, deaf, blind, impairment, wheelchair. Often the government website would link directly with legislation and program descriptions.
- An attempt was made to identify a Disability Issues office or a similar department, to search for programs, benefits and services that were available to citizens.
- Individual government departments (eg., education, transportation, housing, employment) were searched for disability related legislation or programs.
- In instances where these government-based searches did not yield results, a Google search was conducted using the jurisdiction and the keywords above.
- Finally, the Canadian Legal Information Institute (CanLII; <http://www.canlii.org/en/>) -- a non-profit organization managed by the Federation of Law Societies of Canada -- was used as a final check for existing legislation within the jurisdiction. CanLII has the goal to make Canadian law accessible on the internet at no cost.

3. Select data for detailed analysis

The next step was to identify all publicly-available information that was provided free-of-charge on government websites. In order to qualify for further analysis, the information had to conform to the following inclusion criteria:

- Explicitly mentioned disability (see keywords listed above);
- Dealt with legislation or legislated programs administered by government.

An attempt was made to provide comprehensive information on:

- existing legislation, regulations or explicit policy statements;
- bureaucracies or agencies charged with administering the policy;
- a description of the service, program or entitlement;
- contact information for further inquiries.

4. Chart the data according to key concepts

For each jurisdiction, tables were developed that were organized according to ten areas into which most disability policy could be classified:

- General
- Transportation
- Employment
- Housing
- Education
- Citizenship
- Income replacement
- Recreation and leisure
- Taxation
- Health.

Each entry includes:

- The name and date of the statute;
- The Ministry or department administering the statute;
- Specific programs pertaining to people with disabilities if applicable;
- Description of the purpose of the legislation and its provisions for people with disabilities;
- Hyperlinks to government websites where more information can be found.

The findings are presented by jurisdiction – federal; provincial from east to west; territorial from west to east.

*Note: The definition of the term “persons with disabilities” varies across jurisdictions and sectors. It is advised to refer to the respective policy for clarity in definition of the term.
